The home of food, art and sport

Salvador Dalí

art

- He had a weird love for eggs.
Dalí thought eggs symbolized life and perfection — he even decorated his house with giant eggs on the roof!
- He once showed up to a lecture in a diving suit.
He claimed it helped him “dive into the depths of the human mind.” Spoiler: he almost passed out.
- And Salvador Dali once walke a ant eater through paris ir 1969

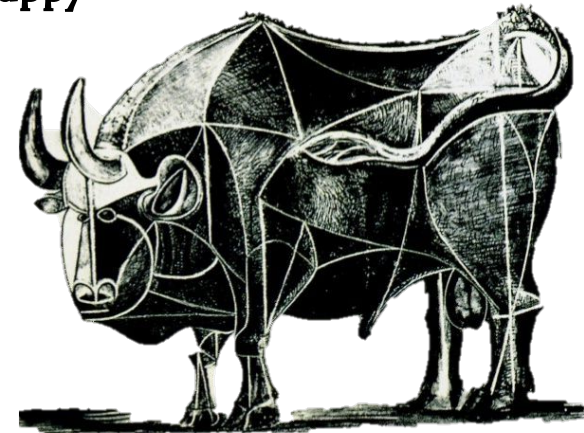

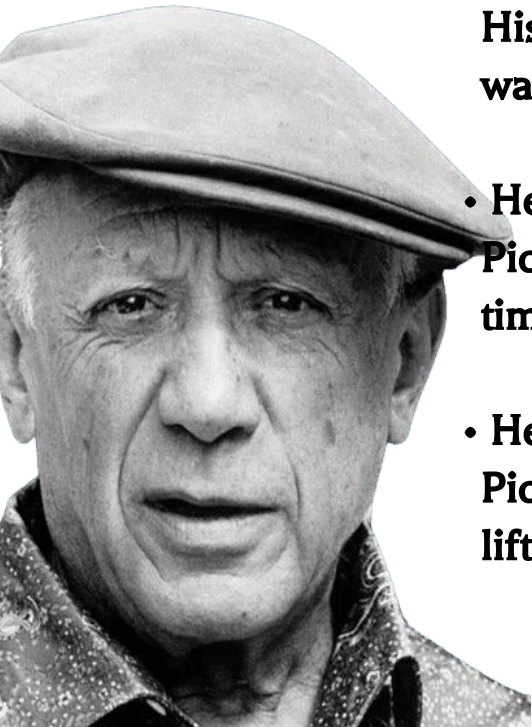

Pablo Picasso

art

- He could draw before he could walk.
His first word was “piz”, short for lápiz (Spanish for “pencil”). That’s how obsessed he was with art — from day one!
- He had a blue period , a rose period , and probably a “just feeling weird” period.
Picasso’s mood literally changed his color palette — sad times = blue paintings, happy times = pink ones.
- He loved bulls and drew like a magician.
Picasso could draw a bull in just one line without lifting his pencil — and it actually looked like a bull !

Bull fights

sport

Bullfighting is a traditional Spanish show where a matador faces a bull in an arena.

It's seen as a mix of art, courage, and drama, especially in southern Spain.

Some call it beautiful, others call it brutal — but everyone agrees it's unforgettable.

Tomato festival celebration

- La Tomatina is often called the “world’s biggest food fight”, with over 150,000 kg of tomatoes thrown in just one hour.
- It began spontaneously in 1945 when some young people started throwing tomatoes during a parade in Buñol.
- Since 2013, participation is limited by tickets to control crowd size (around 20,000 people).
